Quote The problem with the Kontakt library is it only allows you to use the data in the original DAW (Ableton Live, Logic etc) folders which obviously means I can't use it with my Native Instruments controller. This is where it gets very difficult for Kontakt users, and can even cause incompatibility issues with instruments. Whilst there are many plugin synthesists who have made this work without much difficulty, there are few who have found this to be a viable solution. If you have a different view on this than the initial questioner, you may have to reach out to other users on this forum who have followed this path, and be willing to share their experiences of what they have found to be effective. So what is the solution? The best solution for you may simply be to use another plugin, or to use the commercial VST version of Kontakt (a version that is not only available for Mac, but Windows as well). This does not completely stop the Kontakt library working with NI, but does stop it from working with a 'native' NI setup. I'd be interested to know if there is a solution to this problem that is available for Kontakt users. Matt Matt who first pointed this thread out has provided some valuable information in the thread How about this? -Plug-ins allow you to use your NI controller -Combine that with being able to use both the 'plugin' library and also the software environment, and I think that might be a viable solution. As long as you also remember the essential point - that you should treat software like any other instrument Also, it's not only you that's having problems getting this to work on Kontakt - about a third of the users on the thread have tried this solution, and they all report problems with it. And finally the last piece of the puzzle, I came across another thread where a user stated that 'Native Instruments Controller Bridge' is a plugin which does exactly what it says on the tin. Whether this plugin exists in a version that works with Kontakt, I do not know - but it seems to be worth checking out. Thanks for the assistance but I was unable to find the mentioned plugin - this thread was of interest in that it mentioned a solution to my problem and a plugin that does exactly what it says on 82157476af
